/// FOREWORD

We will all remember this year for the war in Syria and the plight of Syrian refugees. Every single day, scores of people have been killed and injured, the number of refugees and internally displaced people has increased, and houses and public places have been demolished or damaged.

We believe that photography has the power to unite people's feelings against all pain and suffering around the world, and get them to do something about it. There are a number of brave journalists and photojournalists who have volunteered to become the voice of people facing the irreversible effect of wars, conflicts, attacks, natural disasters and social events that will be remembered for the rest of our lives.

Although it was only the second edition of the contest, Istanbul Photo Awards 2016 received around 13,000 applications from 84 different countries. This year, we awarded 11 photojournalists from nine countries for their exceptionally fine work combined with their artistic traditions and techniques. I would like to take this occasion to thank all applicants for their striking photographs.

What's more, we are now proudly witnessing the winning photographs from our contest being honored by the Pulitzer Prize jury for the second year in a row. I cannot thank our valuable jury members enough. We are grateful for their services and value the time and the commitment they put into the Istanbul Photo Awards to make it a system of merit.

I would like to now invite you all to take a journey into the most impressive news and sports photographs of 2015.

/// ISTANBUL PHOTO AWARDS

Istanbul Photo Awards is an international news photography contest organized by Anadolu Agency. The contest aims to contribute to the sphere of news photography and offer a perspective shaped by Turkey's unique position at the center of diverse cultures. The awards reward endeavors of courageous and talented photojournalists from around the world on merit.

This year, although it is only the second edition of the contest, Istanbul Photo Awards has become one of the most widely known news photography contests in the world. Istanbul Photo Awards 2016 received around 13,000 applications from photojournalists worldwide. The photographs were assessed in four categories: Single News, Single Sports, Story News, Story Sports, and - in a different category from last year - one photograph was bestowed with the Honor Award.

We remember 2015 for its tragic occurrences, such as war, conflicts, crises and terror attacks targeting civilians. Photojournalists, whose job is basically to inform the world through the lenses of their cameras, documented the most important events of the year.

This photobook encapsulates the key moments from 2015, including the war in Syria, migrants fleeing war, and the ongoing crisis in Ukraine. Along with striking news photographs, we have also included significant sports photographs from around the world. All the winning photographs have the power to engage people against wars and conflicts, and to familiarize them with different cultures.

We would like to take the occasion again to thank the jury of Istanbul Photo Awards 2016 for their kind contribution and for taking time out of their busy schedules to select the winning photographs. The jury had a very tough time selecting the most powerful photos of the year from such a strong field.

We hope you enjoy the photobook for the Istanbul Photo Awards. When you see the photographs and read the stories, you will understand how they reflect the hard work and dedication of news photographers worldwide.

Syrian Children Cry For Help
Aleppo, Syria

An injured Syrian child awaits treatment at a makeshift hospital in the opposition-held area of Douma, northeast of the capital Damascus, following airstrikes by forces loyal to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad on February 2, 2015. More than 200,000 people have been killed in Syria since the conflict started, and around half of the country's population has been displaced.

As Syria's bloody war entered its fourth year, Douma, the largest opposition stronghold in Damascus province, bore witness to heavy bombardment by Syrian government forces. The rural town in the Eastern Ghouta area was recorded as suffering the highest number of fatalities since the start of the uprising against President Bashar al-Assad in March 2011, according to the Syrian Observatory of Human Rights. Among the dead this year were over 2,500 children. With limited access to medical care, the town's small makeshift hospitals have struggled to cope with the number of critically wounded - far beyond the capacity of the medical staff. In the summer of 2015, the ceaseless bombing caused an international outcry, but the shellings did not stop, the tears did not dry and the physical and mental wounds did not heal. Despite an escalation of international peace talks, hopes of the war coming to an end continue to be buried under piles of rubble.

Photo of the Year is a special award within the news photograph category, which includes all single and news story images. The criteria for the award-winning image was that it should encapsulate an unforgettable event of 2015. The image should have the power to mobilize people and it should also be technically excellent.

Photo of the Year 2016 was rewarded to Abd Doumany's image "Syrian Children Cry For Help" which deals with the most important issue of 2015 and perhaps even the decade. The boy in the photo carries all the pain and suffering of the war in Syria. The image tells you so much from Abd Doumany's striking perspective.

▶ ABD DOUMANY

Abd Doumany is a 25-year-old Syrian freelance photographer who was born in the Syrian capital Damascus and is based in Douma in the opposition-held suburbs of Damascus in the Ghouta region. Before the war broke out, Doumany was completing his medical studies to become a dentist, but he stopped his university courses in the third year when he was placed on the Syrian security forces' list of those who were active in the opposition taking pictures, and thus listing violations committed by the authorities during peaceful protests for reform in the early days of the uprising.

It was with real enthusiasm that I boarded my flight to Turkey to participate for the second time in the extremely well organized Istanbul Photo Awards. We went straight to work for the next two days, at the end of which, as the judging drew to an end, I sensed a general air of “compassion fatigue” among my fellow jury members. Not that they would complain, but it was there in their body language nonetheless. We had literally reviewed more than 12000 entries, most of which centered on humanitarian crises in the first degree.

By the end of the first half-day of viewing, the Syrian situation and the plight of the refugees had emerged as the dominant topic for this year’s selection process.

In recent months, we have all seen how the situation in Syria has further deteriorated while the ceasefire process was caught up in the web of geopolitical concerns. Turkey has played an important central role in this ceasefire process, as attempts are made to negotiate a ceasefire that can accommodate the geopolitical realities and satisfy all parties involved. All the while, refugees from Syria continue to pour into Turkey seeking a path to Europe. And as they do, in tandem with the multitude arriving in Greece, the refugee situation has highlighted a fragility to the European Union, which was not previously the case. This new situation also highlights the challenges Europe now faces with the financial crisis in Greece and in concluding a deal with Turkey to stem the flow of Syrian refugees.

Having been through my share of wars and refugee crises in the former Soviet Union, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka, India and the Punjab, the images we looked through together rekindled that haunting sense of guilt we all carry as members of mankind in the face of these crises, and in terms of what we should do to aid these desperate conditions. Certainly, the jury shared this feeling, for each member is a seasoned photographer and all have been in similar situations themselves. With jury members hailing from Europe, North America and Asia, the insight they brought to the process naturally broadened our deliberation and discussion.

The 24-hour news cycle we know today, courtesy of the Internet, can inadvertently trivialize certain important images. Most newspapers have limited editorial space for photographs. We hope that the award-winning photographs will serve to broaden the appeal of the important work such photographers do to the general public.

For us, as jury members, it was a privilege to sit down together and debate the merits of the images and I think we all felt we learned something from looking at the photographs. At the end, we were unable to reach a unanimous vote on the Picture of the Year, but it was the overwhelming choice of the jury to select Abd Doumany’s image of a boy whose blood-framed face and penetrating stare both question and plead with our common humanity. This evocative image of hope in a young boy’s eyes was a hair’s breadth ahead of the second image by Sergey Ponomarev, which depicts the drama of refugees pulling a heavily loaded boat ashore.

Special thanks also to the dedicated staff of Anadolu Agency and their entire team for being at the forefront and center of Middle East coverage.

Aleppo, Syria

Aleppo city was once Syria's economic hub, but it has been ravaged by war and divided between government control in the west and opposition control in the east since shortly after fighting began there in mid-2012. Government planes regularly bomb the eastern part of the city and the opposition fires rockets into the west, leaving a constant trail of destruction and a loss of lives. The town has been a key goal in Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's offensive south of the city, and at the end of September 2015 Russia launched airstrikes in support of al-Assad, resulting in it controlling Kweyris airbase, its first major victory in the Aleppo area. The thunderous shelling in and around the city forced civilians to join the growing number of Syrians fleeing the country, which has reached over four million since the conflict erupted in 2011.

Everyday in Hpakant in Kachin State, Myanmar, hundreds of thousands of young men - most of whom have migrated from different regions of the country with a dream to find a shortcut to wealth - swarm across mountains of mining waste dumped by government-licensed mining companies. Jade mining is a perilous job for small-scale miners, especially when banks and slag heaps are de-stabilized by monsoon rains. A massive landslide in November 2015 at a government-licensed company waste-dumping site reportedly killed 114 people.

MARY F. CALVERT UNITED STATES

Missing In Action: Homeless Female Veterans

U.S.A.

Female veterans are the fastest growing segment of the United States' homeless population and are four times more likely to become homeless than civilian women. Women who have survived military sexual trauma are the most traumatized of this population, and often flounder in unsafe relationships, live in their cars, or endure drug-infested motels to avoid shelters or the street.

Women who courageously served their country in Iraq and Afghanistan have arrived home with healthcare issues - including military sexual trauma and post traumatic stress disorder - to scattered families, jobs that no longer exist, an impotent Department of Veterans Affairs, and to a nation that favors their male counterparts.

Sandra Sherman, 51, left, had only been in the U.S. Army for a few weeks when she was drugged and raped at a party during basic training. She never reported the assault to her command.

"It was well known if you reported rape you would be killed or chaptered out with a less than honorable discharge," she says.

After seven years she left the Army. Unable to work and pay her rent, she spiraled into homelessness.

02

Darlene Matthews shows signs of fatigue after rolling down her window on a rainy evening for a portrait in her car where she has been living for the past three years.

The car is in Costa Mesa, California, in the parking lot of a mortuary next to a graveyard.

03

Homeless veteran Darlene Matthews keeps her belongings in the trunk of her car and in a storage unit in Costa Mesa while she continues to fight with the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs for benefits including housing vouchers.

04

While high on drugs, former U.S. Marine Sarah Jenkins, a military sexual trauma survivor, accepts a bag of food and water from the National Veterans Foundation outreach van for homeless veterans.

05

Though educated with a master's degree, Debra Filter has been homeless for 10 years and has battled the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs for benefits for 30 years. Debra and several other women recruits were raped at a party they were forced to attend upon graduation.

"We didn't realize it was for women and that a great many of us were going to be raped," she says. "I wanted to make the military my career. Rape stopped my career, stopped any dreams I ever had."

06

Paula Anderson and Patricia Butts hold hands during the final serenity prayer at the conclusion of the San Diego Veterans Village Stand Down for homeless veterans.

07

With plastic trash bags to keep her belongings dry, veteran Paula Anderson leaves the San Diego Veterans Village Stand Down in the pouring rain. When Paula was a young woman in the U.S. Army, she was drugged and raped by a fellow soldier. Her military career lasted 17 years, but military sexual trauma has followed her for 20 years.

08

Disabled U.S. Army veteran Karen Scott takes a cocktail of drugs prescribed by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. During her seven years in the army, her fellow soldiers sexually assaulted her on three continents.

Time after time, she says her command did nothing or told her to "Go on to your next duty station and forget about it."

09

Disabled U.S. Army veteran Karen Scott lives in a two-storey apartment in Long Beach, California, where she sleeps next to a portable toilet because she has tremendous problems getting downstairs to the bathroom.

10

Homeless veteran Melissa A. Ramon spent nine years in the U.S. Air Force where she endured military sexual trauma at the hands of her training instructor and fellow airmen.

"You see stripes and think it's power and authority. I went along with it because it was my career [gone] if I'd have stopped. I had the rules and he didn't," she says.

11

Melissa and her son move into a motel in Pomona, California, known locally as "The Jungle".

12

13

Melissa clutches her Air Force uniform under the watchful eye of her dog "Princess".

"That life is dead to me," she says.

14

U.S. Navy veteran Alishaa Dell, 25, lives with a boyfriend who she wants to break up with but she says she has nowhere else to go.

15

U.S. Army veteran Wilma M. Herndon watches TV in her room at the Mary Walker House for homeless women veterans on the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs campus in Coatesville, Pennsylvania.

Turkey has played an important central role in this ceasefire process, as attempts are made to negotiate a ceasefire that can accommodate the geopolitical realities and satisfy all parties involved. All the while, refugees from Syria continue to pour into Turkey seeking a path to Europe. And as they do, in tandem with the multitude arriving in Greece, the refugee situation has highlighted a fragility to the European Union, which was not previously the case. This new situation also highlights the challenges Europe now faces with the financial crisis in Greece and in concluding a deal with Turkey to stem the flow of Syrian refugees.

The images we looked through together for the Istanbul Photo Awards rekindled that haunting sense of guilt we all carry as members of mankind in the face of these crises, and in terms of what we should do to aid these desperate conditions. Certainly, the jury shared this feeling, for each member is a seasoned photographer and all have been in similar situations themselves. With jury members hailing from Europe, North America and Asia, the insight they brought to the process naturally broadened our deliberation and discussion.
